BACKGROUND INFORMATION AND RESEARCH FOR THIS STUDY

The Problem

The major problem in this study has been the compilation of a list of supplementary references that were taken from eleven different sixth grade social studies' textbooks.

A subsidiary problem consisted in the analysis of the list that was made so as to be able to determine the frequency with which the supplementary reference books were mentioned in the various textbooks consulted.

A second subsidiary problem was that of looking up the different supplementary reference books that had been listed in The Children's Catalog.

A third subsidiary problem was that of determining which of the supplementary reference books were listed in Rue's Subject Index in the Intermediate Grades.

Definition of Terms

The following terms have been used throughout this study in the belief that, although few in number, their definition would serve to make the information presented more readily available to those engaged in such lines of research.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION AND RESEARCH FOR THIS STUDY

The Problem

A subsidiary problem connected in the analysis of the list that was made so as to be able to determine the frequency with which the supplementary reference books were mentioned in the various textbooks connected.

A second subsidiary problem was that of looking up the different supplementary reference books that had been listed in The Children's Catalog.

A third subsidiary problem was that of determining which of the supplementary reference books were listed in Hue's Subject Index in the Intermediate Grades.

Definition of Terms

The following terms have been used throughout this study in the belief that, although few in number, their definition would serve to make the information presented more readily available to those engaged in such lines of research.

Reference books.-- This term refers to encyclopedias, books of fiction, history, geography, and biography, which were suggested for further reading by the author, or authors, of the textbooks examined in the course of the study.

Textbooks.-- This refers to any book which forms the basis for regular class instruction; more specifically, it refers to the eleven books from which references to supplementary books were taken.

Supplementary Reading.-- This has reference to any reading that would be done in addition to the reading called for in the textbook.

The Importance of Supplementary Reading

An examination of the majority of textbooks on social studies served to show that there are many references to supplementary reading. According to Lee and Lee,[1]

> Even the traditional history and geography course required supplementary books. The need of such material has been greatly increased with the advent of the activity and unit-of-work program.
> Outstanding have been the supplementary books issued for the social studies. Publishers are attempting to supply the elementary schools with the type of book that will meet the needs of the unit-of-work program. The great differences in courses of study, especially for the fourth, fifth, and sixth grades, have made it extremely difficylt to furnish adequate materials.

In connection with the teaching of geography, Saucier[1] states, "To make geography meaningful the pupil needs to receive information beyond the pages of one text." The teacher's task, however, would automatically become a far easier one if he were to exercise a wise discrimination in his selection of textbooks to be used in the schoolroom. For, if the study of geography is to have any lasting significance for the pupil, in addition to its being factual it should possess a live quality with the power to kindle the imagination. A textbook which is but a dry-as-dust chronicle of places to be found on the map not only has little appeal for the pupil, but also requires considerable effort on the part of the teacher to hold the attention of the class even temporarily. Hence the need of exercising judgment in the choice of textbooks.

However, if the teacher were to look upon such a textbook merely as a reference work,and were to depend upon well chosen supplementary reading, and devices of the proper sort that are largely independent of the text, then its subject material would take on a real meaning in the minds of his pupils. In this connection, Reed[2] makes the following observation:

The controlling principle in such devices should be to select reading and materials that make possible the reconstruction of the experience of firsthand observers. They should be for the child an open window through which he can look out upon the world and see with his mental eye what there is and what goes on there. If this is the ideal, it may be readily seen that the descriptions in our texts are far too scant to make anything like it possible, and that the teacher must rely chiefly on supplementary readings, pictures, inductive teaching, maps, models, collections of products, topical studies, projects, problems, advance questions, booklets, collections of exhibits, pamphlets from commercial firms, dramatizations, and an interesting order of presentation,and the selection of the proper unit of presentation.

Here has been suggested a considerable outlay to accumulate supplementary teaching aids and materials. Nevertheless, with such a treasure-house to draw from, there would be at hand for selection, at the moment when such direction of interest would have the most telling effect, the right materials and devices for the development of particular interests and the expansion of the pupils' mental horizon. In this connection Hockett and Jacobsen[1], after making the sage remark that the superior readers are the voracious readers,emphasize the marked difference there is between past and present methods of instruction along these lines by citing the following anecdote:

"Don't waste your school time on story books," said the old-fashioned teacher, as she seized the book of the child who was filling time by reading. The modern teacher says in spirit,"Here's a greater and more interesting teacher than I am," and hands the child a book which she knows will interest him.

In the reading field, too, it would seem essential to provide a great deal of supplementary material of the best type in order to make sure of building up a vocabulary in the social studies. Guy L.Bond and Eva Bond[1/] claim that

> Much of the development of vocabulary in the social studies will come through extensive reading materials that are rich enough in verbal illustrations to build the needed backgrounds. ....The child should approach such reading with an awareness that one of the important aims of studying the social studies is to build a useful vocabulary of terms frequently employed in the studies.

The use of problems in present-day teaching of reading needs to be furthered. One case, cited by Queree and Smiley,[2/] describes the way in which an important principle was demonstrated in a reading class, that of developing a critical open-mindedness through an extensive use of supplementary reading. Step by step the pupils were led to prove the validity of such a principle, as follows:

> When the children were studying the camel, one pupil made the statement that camels store water in their humps. When some of the class disagreed with him, he said he could prove what he had been saying and proceeded to read the statement from one of the reference books. A pupil who had challenged his statement then read from another book which said that camels store food in their humps and water in their stomachs.
> The children then talked about how they could fairly decide which book was correct. Some suggested finding all the books they could on the subject and seeing what most books said. One child said they could ask someone who knew. The y looked the subject up in three different encyclopedias which the librarian said were reliable and in thirteen other books. Not a single reference they found substantiated the statement that camels store water in their humps. One child called the museum and was told the camel stored water in its stomach and food in its hump.

The children then decided to write a tactful letter to the author of the book, which had made the statement they questioned, in which they would tell her of their findings and see if she had any further proof of her statement. The author answered the letter, thanked them for bringing the matter to her attention, acknowledged that the statement was wrong, and said it would be corrected the next time the book was printed.

In discussing the subject of the problem attack in reading, McKee[1/] considers the use of the multiple references important because it requires the child to read widely,and thus he is provided with new and enriched experiences linked up with the world about him; as well, he gains a great deal of practice in reading. McKee cites, however, three of the major difficulties to be faced by the intermediate grade teacher for which he must be prepared, if he uses the problem attack:

The first is concerned with the availability of reading materials. In most schools there are no books to serve as multiple references. Most of the extra money has been spent for sets of the so-called supplementary readers. Obviously, it is more economical in terms of instruction for school authorities to purchase one or two copies of many different factual books than to supply a given room with one or two sets of supplementary readers. With the former policy carried out the utilization of the problem method becomes possible, provided considerable care is used in selecting the few copies of the many different books.

Ernest Horn,[1] in stressing the need of having as many supplementary books as possible, not only to provide extensive reading but also to take care of individual differences in abilities and interests, makes the following bit of constructive criticism:

> It is evident that competent committees could render an invaluable service by constructing, after due deliberation, minimum and expanded lists of books that are most valuable for the various units or problems in the social studies.

Not only does this educator look upon supplementary reading as an essential feature of any modern teaching program for children but he also considers that the lack of such material in the schools tends to place too much of a burden upon the teacher. He adds further:[2]

> Teachers cannot be expected to achieve the purposes set up to guide the development of intelligent citizens unless the equipment essential to that development is provided. Yet every investigation of instructional equipment in the social studies has shown that the library facilities in most schools, both rural and urban, and at all levels from the primary grades through high school, are far below the irreducible minimum that is necessary if instruction in the social studies is to be more than a sham and formality.

Baldwin[3] stresses the importance of reference materials, especially in the intermediate grades, claiming that the social studies' classrooms are poorly equipped for the kind of activities they house.

> A considerable portion of the money spent for supplementary reading is unwisely spent or wasted, due to the inefficient and haphazard methods of showing library materials; and this despite the fact that supplementary materials in most schools are woefully inadequate. 1/

To the foregoing statement, Swindler adds that "Extensive reading outside the basal text has been fully justified on the basis of tangible results achieved."2/

Furthermore, it is found that literature, on the subject of the importance of supplementary reading, bears out the following points:

1. The advent of change in the curriculum from stereotyped work to activity and unit of work problems has necessitated many more supplementary reading references.

2. There is a need for adequate reading materials.

3. There is a need, on the part of children, for broader informational background, which is accomplished by delving into more books.

4. Extra reading makes events, places, concepts more meaningful to the child.

5. Extra reading creates more interest.

6. Extra reading develops vocabulary.

7. Extra reading develops critical thinking, a necessary adjunct to democratic procedures.

8. There is a need for making wise choices in selecting supplementary books.

9. Children learn more efficiently by general reading than by intensive reading during a given period of time.

Related Studies

Research of the type similar to this study up to this time has been done chiefly in the secondary level of education.

Helmreick[1/] made a study of twenty-nine texts in medieval and modern, in modern, and in world history. In these 1,295 references were noted. Two important findings were made, namely, that (1) authors of textbooks differed widely in their selections of supplementary materials; and (2) the references listed were not necessarily adaptable to the needs and abilities of high school students.

In her thesis which contained materials gathered from extensive researches on the subject of collateral reading, Cattell[2/] also brings out two important points, namely, that (1) public libraries should be used to supplement school reference materials; and that (2) training of the pupils in the use of the library is absolutely essential.

Norton[1] made a study of reading lists used in junior and senior high schools; and has listed her findings as follows: (1)Teachers in all sections of the United States use supplementary reading; (2) A considerable variety of reading materials was found; (3) seventy-eight per cent of the teachers considered supplementary reading as of some value to pupils; 14 per cent considered that it was of no importance; (4) more than 50 per cent of the teachers thought that a variety of forms of collateral reading is desirable.

In a study that embraced wide, extensive reading versus class reading, Field[2] found that there was no significant difference, as far as the developing of the ability to read, is concerned. She found evidence, however, that extensive reading had other positive values.

Boney[3] confirms the fact that collateral reading: (1) develops strong motives for permanent interest in reading; and that (2) rich and varied backgrounds are developed through reading, while (3) there should be regular supervised periods of supplementary reading which would permit the pupils to make selections according to their own interests and volition.

Coady[1], in a study of reading references in senior high school American History textbooks, found 2,512 individual reading references, present in all five textbooks. He also found that there was little uniformity between textbooks with regard to supplementary reading references, and furthermore, that no regard was paid to the facilities of the average high school library. Nor did he find much conformity in choice of supplementary reading references between authors of textbooks and published lists of recommended readings.

Coady[1] in a study of reading references in senior high school American History textbooks, found 2,512 individual reading references, present in all five textbooks. He also found that there was little uniformity between textbooks with regard to supplementary reading references, and furthermore, that no regard was paid to the facilities of the average high school library. Nor did he find much conformity in choice of supplementary reading references between authors of textbooks and published lists of recommended readings.

CHAPTER II

THE PLAN OF THE STUDY

Organization of Data

Eleven textbooks were used in the course of this study. All of them were selected on the basis of the fact that they were:

1. Commonly used as sixth grade textbooks.

2. Concerned with the historical aspects of the old world background to our modern civilization.

Other texts were examined, but since no references were found in them they were not included in the study.

A Master List.-- Any reference to a supplementary list was carefully noted, and from the lists thereby compiled, a master list was drawn up.

This master list was tabulated alphabetically according to author on the left side of the page, with the eleven textbooks at the heading. Also included in the heading were The Children's Catalog, and Rue's Subject Index to Books for the Intermediate Grades.

On this list were recorded the number of texts in which any reference book was mentioned; and also, how many times each author of a textbook had referred to each supplementary reference. Then a check was made to find out whether or not the reference was listed in The Children's Catalog, or in

Organization of Data

Eleven textbooks were used in the course of this study. All of them were selected on the basis of the fact that they were:

1. Commonly used as sixth grade textbooks.
2. Concerned with the historical aspects of the old world background to our modern civilization.

Other texts were examined, but since no references were found in them they were not included in the study.

A Master List.-- Any reference to a supplementary list was carefully noted, and from the lists thereby compiled, a master list was drawn up.

This master list was tabulated alphabetically according to author on the left side of the page, with the eleven textbooks at the heading. Also included in the heading were The Children's Catalog, and Hue's Subject Index to Books for the Intermediate Grades.

On this list were recorded the number of texts in which any reference book was mentioned; and also, how many times each author of a textbook had referred to each supplementary reference. Then a check was made to find out whether or not the reference was listed in The Children's Catalog, or in Rue's Subject Index to Books for the Intermediate Grades.

Mode of Procedure.-- From the master list thus computed, tables of reference books were compiled according to levels of frequency, or the number of times that they had been listed in each of the eleven textbooks used. Thus, for example, those books listed most often were shown by Table 1, and those books listed next most often were shown by Table 2.

Median copyright dtta has been computed for each of the tables, except Tables 1 and 2, that list but one book each.

An interpretation of the data accompanies each table, on which asterisks have been used for the purpose of clarification.

In the case of Table 8, the headings refer to the number of reference books mentioned in the study and, as well, to the number of references found in each textbook. The numbers in the left-hand column represent the textbooks according to their listing on pages 15 and 16. It was believed that, through such a method of tabulation, some clue might be found relative to the use of parallel textbooks and/or general reading references.

List of Textbooks Used

The following eleven textbooks were used as sources in compiling the list of supplementary books called for in this study:

1. Barker, Eugene C., Mabel R. Grimm, and Matilda Hughes, The Story of Earliest Times, Row, Peterson and Co., Evanston, Illinois, 1936.

2. Barker, Eugene C., Mabel R. Grimm, and Matilda Hughes, The Story of Old Europe and New America, Row, Peterson and Co., Evanston, Illinois, 1937.

3. Freeland, G. E., and James T. Adams, America's World Backgrounds, C. Scribner's Sons, New York, 1936.

4. Greenan, John T., and H. Louise Cottrell, From Then Until Now, McGraw-Hill Book Co., Inc., New York, 1936.

5. Hartman, Gertrude, Builders of the Old World, D. C. Heath and Company, Boston, 1946.

6. Kelty, Mary G., Teaching History in the Intermediate Grades, Ginn and Company, Boston, 1936.

(Although this is not a textbook, it was included in this study because it contains reference books for supplementary reading and since it normally would accompany a companion textbook as a teacher's manual.)

7. Knowlton, Daniel C., and Mary A. Wheeler, Our Past in Western Europe, American Book Company, New York, 1935.

CHAPTER III

PRESENTATION AND INTERPRETATION OF THE DATA

In an effort to present the findings of this study in as simple a manner as possible and, as well, to explain them more or less satisfactorily, tables have been given a major place in the text. On these tables, as a further means of clarifying the information gleaned, asterisks were used extensively: one asterisk was placed before the names of books which are listed in The Children's Catalog; two astericks were put before the names of books which are listed in Rue's Subject Index to Books for the Intermediate Grades; and three asterisks were used to indicate the names of textbooks which were found in The Children's Catalog and also in Rue's Subject Index to Books for the Intermediate Grades.

Out of eleven textbooks and six hundred and forty-six total references, the book listed in Table 2 was mentioned six times, or about .15 of one per cent. As has been indicated on the table, this book has been listed both in The Children's Catalog and in Rue's Subject Index to Books for Intermediate Grades.

It would seem that, according to their frequency of mention in textbooks common to the sixth grade, these two books listed in Tables 1 and 2 undoubtedly would be assets to any elementary school library.

Some authors make a practice, for instance, of using parallel textbooks to which they refer quite frequently, while others employ a variety of textbooks, but do not use as many references. In some instances, probably in order to save space, only the last name of the author referred to or the partial title of the textbook mentioned, was given; or the name of the author referred to,was misspelled. Often, too, in the course of preparing the study, it was found that the number of pages in a reference work referred to, or other essential data, were left out of the bibliographical listing.

For the different reasons given, it can easily be seen that the task of making any such study would have been very greatly mimimized, if there had been less unnecessary bits of research to do when assembling its different parts. As it is, sometimes considerable difficulty is experienced when trying to find specific books in the libraries, let alone to bring together what is essential information in building up a scholarly type of bibliography.

CHAPTER IV

CONCLUSIONS AND SUGGESTIONS FOR FURTHER RESEARCH

Conclusions

It would seem to be evident that there is no great bond of agreement existing between authors on the subject of supplementary reference books for sixth grade social studies' textbooks. Thus, since that is the situation, it might be an advantageous course to secure for use those reference books listed within the textbook being used, in an effort to carry out the ideas there suggested.

After such supplementary books have been secured, it would seem to be a wise course to consider next those books which authors of social studies' textbooks have found to be good supplementary reference books.

Some authors use few references, but refer to them quite often; others use many references, but refer to them only a few times throughout the text. It might be observed here, that authors themselves have seemed not to realize the importance to the reading public of their scanning their scripts, as a last-minute procedure before sending them to the publishers, for errors or corrections, or for omissions.

A copyright date, according to the evidence contained in this study, is no criterion for good literature. This

It might be observed here, that authors themselves have seemed not to realize the importance to the reading public of their scanning their scripts, as a last-minute procedure before sending them to the publishers, for errors or corrections, or for omissions.

A copyright date, according to the evidence contained in this study, is no criterion for good literature. This conclusion was arrived at after scanning the copyright dates of books to be found listed alike in The Children's Catalog and in Rue's Subject Index to Books for Intermediate Grades, amounting to two hundred and ninety supplementary reference books.

Moreover, in comparison with the number of supplementary books available in the secondary level of education, there is a definite paucity of books for use of children at the elementary level of education.

Recommendations for Further Study

The following recommendations are offered for consideration:

1. Further studies of this nature should be conducted on the lower grade levels.

2. A study to determine children's preferences for supplementary reading, as compared to author's preferences, could be made.

3. It might be worth while to find out why, and to what extent, authors use parallel textbooks as references through a study made to determine whether or not authors select their supplementary references on the basis of wishing to stress a point, or to enlarge upon a topic.
